Description

Housing remains an elusive dream for the hundreds of thousands of Haitians who still live in displacement camps in and around Port-au-Prince. An effective social housing policy that guarantees safe and dignified housing to vulnerable families was needed long before the January 2010 earthquake. To date, no such plan has been created.

Deteriorating conditions in camps, ongoing forced evictions and disasters like Hurricane Sandy in October 2012 highlight the urgency of ensuring that all families have access to adequate and affordable housing. Although private/public partnerships are being envisioned in a Government of Haiti (GOH) draft housing policy, there have not been broad consultations with those most in need of a comprehensive, human-rights approach to housing. GOH and donor efforts have thus far focused on short-term rental programs that ignore the structural causes of Haiti's housing crisis.

Haitian civil society organizations and grassroots groups are calling for governmental intervention against illegal forced evictions; consultation of displaced communities, especially women, in the formulation of housing plans; housing that meets international standards in terms of safety, affordability, habitability and accessibility; and the designation of public land on which to build. The third commemoration of the earthquake was an occasion to look towards such permanent solutions to the housing crisis in Haiti.

Analysis

This panel was devoted to the exploration of different models of housing being used by different organizations in Haiti. Theo Sither of Mennonite Central Committee introduced the panel in context: officially, the number of people in need of housing in Haiti has decreased, but there are still over 350,000 people living in tents; these people face unsafe conditions and the threat of eviction. Several thousand have been moved to temporary accommodation but have no indication of what national plans or projects will provide them with permanent housing.

Colette Lespinasse, Executive Director of the Support Group to Repatriates and Refugees (GARR), spoke first and continued Sither's description of the current situation. She noted the main challenges as building on arable, unoccupied land; financing housing; and fostering the credibility of the government.

"Several thousands have been moved, but only to temporary accommodations, and we have no indication of what national plans will eventually provide them with permanent and dignified housing."

Theo Sither

Lespinasse added that because of the lack of a public policy about housing in Haiti, people are building their own homes as they did before the quake. The current government program, which gives people money to rent homes in shanty towns is unsustainable.

If another earthquake occurs, Lespinasse warned, Haiti will face the same problems it did in 2010. Lespinasse's primary ask was for a comprehensive national housing policy that would accounts for the diverse needs of the population it slated to serve.

"We are building the same products that caused the catastrophe in 2010. If we had another earthquake – and it's entirely possible - we would relive the same devastation."

Colette Lespinasse

This reorganization of space should begin with decentralization and must address land issues as well, because the land and housing reform are highly connected. A successful policy could lead to increased job opportunities from the construction industry as well as a decrease in violence against women, if they are able to reside in places where they can "regain dignity and live in peace".

“The majority of those who have left the camps still do not have adequate housing.”

Colette Lespinasse

Georges Werleigh, of the Institute for Leadership Training and Technology (ITECA), then highlighted his organization’s achievements and advised that reconstruction not only include building houses, but other issues as well, such as food security, decentralization and agriculture. Any housing policy should be one of inclusion and establish linkages among the state, foreign NGOs, and local partners.

Jean-Ariel Joseph, the Secretary General of the Haitian Senate, advocated that the psychological and economic aspects of housing and construction in general be considered. Construction should progress based on the context of the houses; for example, schools should be built in rural areas so that they allow all children to attend school.

Joseph then discussed how children should learn skills, such as working with livestock or in fisheries, at the same time that they are receiving a formal education. Furthermore, seizing upon what turned into a familiar theme, he noted that housing should include “everything”: decentralization, education, etc.

Representative Frederica Wilson

Rep. Frederica Wilson (D-FL) then spoke about her devotion to Haiti and detailed a current Habitat for Humanity program in the country: free houses are being built that families can live in for five years. After five years, the family is expected to pay rent to Habitat to cover both the previous five years and the subsequent years. She also highlighted an effort by one NGO to plant five million trees in Haiti, which would help protect the country from natural disasters, “help with farms, and ensure that peasants have work.” She encouraged others within the international community who had pledged money to Haiti to be held accountable to what they had promised.
